The Madness and the Miracles

Something's up. There's an acceleration going on. Everything is changing faster than before. Even if you can't explain it, you can feel it. From one perspective, it's as if we're seeing two extremes emerge: the madness and the Miracles. The madness—you know what the madness looks like—is the chaos; the horrific headlines and the nightly news hype; the wholesale selling of sicknesses of every kind; the overloaded nervous systems; the repressed emotions; the unwillingness to see others' points of view as valid, much less valuable; the enslavement to the moneylenders who have wheedled their way, not only back onto the church steps, but, even worse, into the core of the human heart; the deceit, so blatant, among our governments and their leaders—leaders whom we once respected and trusted to care about our best interests, but who now more resemble Attila the Hun.

Indeed, humanity sits at a crossroad. Those who are choosing to remain immersed in the madness of the mainstream consensus reality appear to be going into greater states of discomfort. By holding fast to our old habits and the “time is money” mindset, we unwittingly tighten the shackles that bind us to our own stress and suffering. It's as if we possess the key to the door of our own prison cell, and yet, by refusing to acknowledge that our mainstream reality is but one reality out of an infinite number of realities that are available to us, we neglect to place the key in the lock that's right in front of us and give it a turn.

The other extreme—the Miracles—is beginning to reveal itself to anyone who is willing to let go of their attachment to the status quo and explore their highest potential. Here's just one story that happened to me as I traveled across the country over the last few years.

I was in Mt. Shasta recently, presenting a workshop in a bookstore and showing the people there how to start an Intenders Circle. Since that area of California is so beautiful, I decided to stay on after the workshop and camp for a few days with the magnificent mountain looming before me. This happened to be during the height of tourist season, but I was fortunate to find a space in a lovely campground eight miles out of Shasta where I could pitch my tent.

The only problem with this particular campground was that there were no bathing facilities. In order to wash myself, I had to go down to the Sacramento River, which ran through the middle of the campground, dip a gallon jug into the water, crouch down, and pour the water over my head—hopping, cussing, and muttering the whole time because I'm a Hawaii boy who is used to warm water and this water was ICE COLD!

One afternoon, after I'd been there for about four days, I was sitting at a picnic table with a half-dozen strangers, just socializing. I really didn't know anything about them, and they didn't know about me or that I was learning to manifest things by making intentions. The main topic of our conversation was the current heat wave that had hit northern California (this was in mid-August, and the thermometer hanging on the camp manager's office said it was 108 degrees that day). As you can imagine, everyone was sweating profusely, and with the bathing arrangements the way they were, you really didn't want to be sitting downwind of anyone. At one point, there was a lull in our conversation and I just happened to blurt out, "I intend I have a hot shower tonight and get good and clean again!"

Well, they all looked at me as if I were crazy. No more than ten minutes had gone by when, suddenly, a large deer ran through the campground. It bounded past the picnic table where we were sitting and into a clearing behind us that was surrounded by a thicket of tall bushes. As I said earlier, I'm from Hawaii, and, in case you don't know it, there aren't any deer in Hawaii. I'd never seen a real-life deer before, so I jumped up and ran to get a better look at it.

All I saw when I got there was a white tail disappearing into the thicket. The deer was gone and I was left standing in the clearing about fifteen feet away from where my new friends were sitting at the picnic table. The only other thing in the clearing was a single tree about twenty-five feet tall, and on the back side of the tree (where you couldn't see it from the picnic table), was a broken stub of a branch. The branch was at head level and hanging on it, left there by a previous camper, was one of those black plastic solar shower bags.

You can imagine how much fun I had carrying that solar shower bag back to the picnic table. To make a long story short, by sunset, we all had a hot shower and my new friends weren't looking at me like I was so crazy anymore.

One of the easiest ways to make the break from the madness and step into the Miracles is by saying The Code once a day. With a little practice, you'll see The Code begin to work on many aspects of your life at the same time. Initially, it will help you detach from the madness by learning to observe it dispassionately. You'll stop buying into all the dramas and distractions of this world and start to focus on your dreams.

That's when the Miracles come in. Indeed, from the moment we learn to hold our attention on "the end result from the beginning," we are consciously creating our world, a world where everyone is treated with respect and we are all aligned with the Highest Good.

As our manifesting skills increase and we abandon our old, previously ensconced limitations, we discover how to generate free energy, re-grow limbs, rejuvenate organs, build completely new bodies for ourselves—and that's just the beginning. The more we learn to calm our minds through daily prayer and meditation, hold steadfast and focused upon our intended outcomes, and line up with The Code, the more we come to see that everything is possible.
